

From the roots of our past,
GROW the promises of tomorrow.

American Indian Heritage Month

November, 2010

Illustration courtesy of Smoker Marchand
Colville Confederated Tribes

For many tribes in the American Northwest, salmon are a fundamental part of religion, culture and sustenance. Cultural and religious ceremonies are often connected to salmon and their annual return to spawn in tribal waters - providing the transfer of traditional values between past, present and future generations. Salmon and the rivers they live in provide a sense of place and pride for the people of these tribes. Consequently, protecting the resources which allow the salmon to survive and flourish is a critical conservation and cultural endeavor.

USDA  NRCS Natural Resources
Conservation Service

Produced by Washington and Oregon

USDA is an equal opportunity service provider and employer.